

An Okanagan home by
Interior Designer of the Year
Mitchell Freedland artfully combines outdoors and indoors.

An Inside Job

A Montana honey ledge stone wall carries the eye seamlessly from interior to exterior in this Okanagan residence. The client asked designer Mitchell Freedland to take his colour inspirations from the palette of the local scenery. "Public areas were designed for indoor/outdoor entertaining, while private areas were to be more insular and formal," says Freedland.

HOMES & DESIGN

Caramel, gold and walnut shades from the ledge stone on the walls inspired furniture choices in the living room. Much of the furniture was custom designed and made locally. The delicately coffered ceiling is a beautiful detail.

An entranceway creates a stunning view corridor (above left). A bathroom gets a luxe treatment of bookmatched marble floors (top right). In the kitchen, a walnut-panelled ceiling and over-height cabinets make the room warm and help preserve its human scale (above right). The generous island, impressive wine-cellar wall and stunning views make the space gleam. A seating composition in the master bedroom (below) balances the room. See SOURCES.
